How many good, high paying, manufacturing jobs have we sent to Asia over the past 30 years? Thousands? Tens of thousands? Millions? We can quibble over exact numbers, but we all know it has been a lot. For people to work those jobs in China they need power, so now we will send them coal to burn for that power. In return we get a couple hundred new jobs to replace some of the many that we've lost. I don't like the looks of that trend. ~~§~~

Also in return we'll get some of the air pollution from burning that coal. Possibly 30% of our Northwest air pollution could be coming from China. And of course the (additional space is provided on the back)

whole world gets the atmospheric carbon pollution in the form of  $\text{CO}_2$  to deal with. Let's seek new jobs some other way.
